Gamblers play winning hand

When Dan Peterson came to Northeast in 1978 to be the director of bands, the marching band had a difficult time keeping enough members to justify its name, the Marching 100.

Today, the Showboat Gamblers boasts 220 members, new uniforms and a ranking among the top 10 marching bands in the nation. Showboat Gamblers is the largest marching band in Missouri for a school Northeast's size.

Changing the name to give the band a more glamorous image was just the beginning of Peterson's reforms. He stepped up recruitment efforts by performing at high school band festivals and competitions at least twice a year. The band also changed from the traditional Big 10 marching style to the corps style, a more artistic marching design. An important step in revitalizing the band was the increased student involvement.

"We have an involved system of student leadership in the band, especially for older students. We're constantly talking about the individual's performance as well as the band's," Peterson said.

All the changes have paid off. The Showboat Gamblers was one of nine bands nationwide selected to perform at the convention of the College Band Directors National Society in 1984 and 1986. They were one of two bands featured in the first issue in June of the national magazine Marching Bands & Corps, the first such specialized publication. The drum-line of the marching band ranked second in the nation in 1982 and third in 1983 and 1984 at the Spartan Percussion Festival in Chicago.

Peterson said the quality of the band can also be judged by its individual members. Three graduate students in the past five years have gone on to become band directors at larger universities across the nation. Jeff Hinton, a 1982 graduate, performed in the 1984 Olympic band and at the 1986 liberty celebration in New York. The Disney All-American College Marching Band, comprised of only 20 students, has had an NMSU band member each year for the past six.

Senior saxophonist Doug Teel said the current success of the band is attracting increasingly better performers.

"It's like Northeast's value added. As the caliber of the student increases, so does the reputation, and then you're attracting even higher-quality students," Teel said.

Recruiting top-notch high school students has been easy, Peterson said.

"We know when we get our bands out in front of high school kids, it's standing ovation time."

Peterson said Northeast's new designation as Missouri's public liberal arts and sciences university has helped in recruitment by making "nonbelievers believers" in the quality of NMSU's programs. Peterson said he hopes the band in return presents the kind of image of quality the University is looking for in its new mission.

Besides performing during half time at football games and marching in the Homecoming parade, Showboat Gamblers performs at high school festivals and in professional stadiums. They performed the half time show at the Busch Stadium game, Nov. 1.

Kirkpatrick gives international lesson

President Ronald Reagan knows how George Washington felt.

Jean Kirkpatrick, former U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations, told an audience Tuesday night at Pershing Arena that Congress asked Washington, during his presidency, to "limit the number of U.S. troops to 5,000." Relating the story to the present race for military superiority among the superpowers, Kirkpatrick said that Washington would adhere to their wishes only if every other nation agreed to limit their troops to 3,000.

The arm's race was one topic Kirkpatrick addressed in her talk titled "Remarks by the Hon. Jean Kirkpatrick," Kirkpatrick, a Levey University Professor at Georgetown University, Washington, D.C., said she prefers the title of her talk because it enables her to speak more freely.

"The reason I didn't want to give a more specific title to my address tonight, was that I like to talk about events that are somewhat in the news," Kirkpatrick told the crowd.

While discussing the recent U.S.-Soviet summit in Reykjavik, Iceland, Kirkpatrick said that U.S. Secretary of State George Schultz addressed the summit as the "highest-stakes poker game in the world." "As we reflect on it, we can see that it wasn't really a poker game at all, because the pot was left on the table," Kirkpatrick said.

Speaking on the Strategic Defense Initiative (SDI) proposal, Kirkpatrick cited Reagan's questioning of "how can it damage them (Soviet Union) for us to be able to defend ourselves against their missiles?"

"For the Soviets to gain enough military superiority, that we would be susceptible to nuclear blackmail, all that has to happen...[is] they have defensive missiles to guard against our offensive missiles and we have no defensive missiles," Kirkpatrick said.

Citing the fact that most experts say the SDI will block only 85 percent of the incoming missiles, Kirkpatrick defended the proposal saying it is 85 percent or "zero percent...the choice to me is obvious."

Addressing terrorism, Kirkpatrick said the U.S. must strive to show "that targeting Americans will not be a cost-free demonstration." Specifically mentioning Iran's Ayatollah Khomeini and Libya's Moammar Qaddafi as prominent figures in world terrorism, Kirkpatrick stressed that the U.S. might need to "lower our sights a bit, and protect our own."

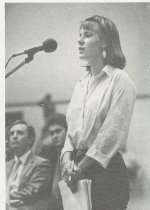

Siding with the President on the issue of aid to the Contra rebels in Nicaragua, Kirkpatrick said keeping the Central American nation free from dominant Soviet influence is crucial. She said the U.S. must prevent a repressive dictatorship and also stop the establishment of a Soviet arms buildup within the country. Saying Nicaragua has "become a capital of terrorism in the Western Hemisphere," Kirkpatrick further stated the importance of U.S. aid.

The majority of the evening's issues had an impact on the international political arena, but Kirkpatrick lightened the mood by giving a few personal insights into the personality of a friend.

"He is a modest man...and vastly more informed about the world than most people think he is. He is a very genuine person," Kirkpatrick said about the President of the United States.

Kirkpatrick's visit was co-sponsored by the NMSU Lyceum Series and the Kirksville College of Osteopathic Medicine. The lecture was also supported by the Kirksville Regional Arts Council.
