Peacock Named Director of Assessment and Testing

Vice President for Academic Affairs Jack Magruder has announced the appointment of Dennis Peacock as director of Assessment and Testing. Peacock, formerly dean of institutional research at Columbia College in Chicago, began his duties March 15.

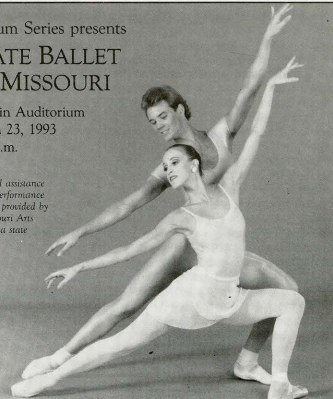

"My first priority is to familiarize myself thoroughly with the assessment process at the University, so that we can then move thoughtfully on a variety of issues," Peacock said.

Peacock received his bachelor's in English and German from the College of William and Mary. He holds a doctorate in applied linguistics from Cornell University. Previous to his appointment, he served as director of the Graduate Division and a self-study coordinator at Columbia College. He also served as assistant provost, associate director/acting director of admissions and assistant director of the humanities department at Illinois Institute of Technology.

Peacock serves as a consultant-evaluator for the Commission on Institutions of Higher Education, North Central Association of Colleges and Schools. He is a member and institutional representative of the Association for Institutional Research.

McGuire Helps Area Elementary Schools Teach Science and Math

Brian McGuire, associate professor of science, and students from his general chemistry class have been helping Kirksville Elementary School third graders learn science and math via "grocery-store" chemistry.

McGuire, accompanied by four to eight undergraduates, has been visiting the third-grade classes since the beginning of the 1992-93 academic year. During these hour-long visits, McGuire and his students help the children perform two or three experiments which relate to the material previously studied in the third-grade class.

The Missouri Key Skills and Core Competencies requirement specifies that elementary students should learn a certain amount of math and science. Teachers at the elementary level, however, often need assistance implementing educational techniques that fulfill this requirement.

In response to this need, McGuire devised this educational program voluntarily. Through the experiments, which he terms "grocery-store" chemistry, he hopes to demonstrate to the youngsters that science can be fun and easy to do.

By "grocery-store," McGuire means that the experiments involve household items. Some examples include counting the number of drops of water that will fit on a penny, the chemical reactions that occur between vinegar and baking soda, and the probability involved in rolling dice.

McGuire has been helping area elementary schools for almost five years. He was involved in the K-SAM project (kindergarten through sixth grade science and math) in which he taught a class of 20-30 elementary teachers one afternoon a week in the areas of science and math at the elementary level. Because the Kirksville school system was not involved in this project, McGuire devised the current program to specifically aid this community.

The benefits of this program are all-inclusive. For instance, serving as teachers, undergraduates get to see what it's like on the other side of the desk.

McGuire states, "They [the undergraduates] learn that you can't teach unless the student is responsive to learning and this lesson makes them better students in return."

McGuire adds, "The best fringe benefit is that I take the undergraduates out to eat after our visit. These students now have a shared experience about the same subject matter and they have seen how they can benefit people."

The teachers and students also benefit through the introduction of a new teaching style. Instead of having the children sit in rows and wait to be called upon for questions and/or answers, McGuire and his students encourage the kids to answer all at once and to get involved in their learning by hands-on experiments. McGuire also uses repetition of ideas and gets the children to verbalize what they are learning.

Initially, some of the elementary teachers feared that this kind of classroom setting was too noisy, but McGuire assured them that he liked that the children were responding.

He adds, "Now teachers are asking me to come back again and again."

Furthermore, he has seen a positive change in the elementary students. They are now more willing to ask and answer questions without waiting to be called upon and they cheer when McGuire and his students enter the school.

Beyond the teachers and children, McGuire is now incorporating the parents into the learning process. On Feb. 6, NMSU hosted a Science Day. Elementary students and their families participated in “grocery store” experiments similar to those done in the classroom. McGuire’s goal was to show parents experiments that can be done at home with their children.

McGuire’s ultimate goal in organizing these cooperative efforts is to eventually establish a hands-on exploratorium in Kirksville. Using the University, as well as KCOM and other local industries as resources, he envisions the exploratorium to be an active museum. Complete with static exhibits and hands-on experiment stations, McGuire hopes to create a learning center that would emphasize local industries such as agriculture, the medical center, and printing services.

Meanwhile, the work that McGuire and his students have done, and continue to do, has benefited a great number of people.
