Charles J. McClain, President

In celebrating our nation's Bicentennial we are reminded of many of the traditions of the past and the principles upon which our nation was built. Our forefathers realized that the most important principle is freedom and that knowledge is necessary to maintain freedom. Thomas Jefferson said, "If a nation expects to be ignorant and free, in a state of civilization, it expects what never was and never will be." This has been one of our guiding principles at Northeast since our founding in 1867.

NMSU's Bicentennial Committee has conducted a number of outstanding programs to celebrate our nation's 200th birthday. William Unger, professor of art, has nearly completed a mural in the hall on the third floor of the Student Union. It is a composition featuring portions of the Thomas Hart Benton murals in the State Capitol and will tell the story of Missouri. This mural will serve the future as a lasting reminder of our past, and will be dedicated during the 1976 Homecoming.

America has much to be proud of on her 200th birthday. It is my belief that the future leaders of our country, today's students, will contribute to our greatness as an educated and free nation.

Editors' Note

Northeast Missouri State University has been given what is believed to be the largest collection of Lincoln books, papers, films, slides, photographs and other memorabilia now in the hands of a private collector. Announcement of the gift by Fred D. Schwengel was made in January. Mr. Schwengel is an alumnus of NMSU and now president of the U. S. Capitol Historical Society.

In addition to the gift of the Lincoln collection, Schwengel donated $1,000 to the University for the establishment of a Lincoln trust fund to assist in the preservation and continuation of the collection and to provide for awards for outstanding writings or speeches on Lincoln.

Schwengel told a gathering of the Board of Regents, President Charles J. McClain and other friends that he intended to add to the fund by donating half of what he received from future honorariums with the other half going to the U. S. Capitol Historical Society.

"This then becomes a down payment on what is owed to this school for the patience, talents shared for inspiration and spiritual guidance, for encouragement and financial help, for growth and stature, earned and given with a degree and most of all for the development of a desire to serve fellowmen. It was here in this place where I learned that it is your and our business to make other men wiser and better as we can find or make opportunity to do so," Schwengel said.

Schwengel added that the transfer of the collection will begin this summer with 50 to 100 prints of Lincoln being sent to NMSU. In addition, part of his private library will be transferred to NMSU from Davenport, Iowa.

In an earlier meeting Schwengel and members of the Board of Regents discussed remodeling part of Pickler Memorial Library where the collection will be housed.

After Schwengel's presentation, President McClain said: "We are overpowered by your dynamic personality. Your old friend, Harry Truman, would be proud of you tonight. For after all your travels and experiences and with the many universities, libraries and other collectors seeking your tremendous Lincoln collection, you have returned home to your alma mater. I think this is just what the former president would have done if he had had the opportunity."

The president of the Board of Regents, William O. Lee of Moberly said: "As our nation celebrates its Bicentennial, it is indeed fitting that Mr. Schwengel has chosen this time to announce this wonderful gift to the University. This occasion will be marked as a milestone in the history of this institution. Its implications in years to come are so far reaching that they cannot even be dreamed of tonight."

Schwengel, a 1930 graduate of NMSU, served for a number of terms in Congress from Iowa's First District. He helped organize the United States Historical Society and now is its president.

He is co-author of a book, "We the People", which has sold over three million copies, making it the best selling history book of all time.

Before entering politics, Schwengel was a teacher and coach, having coached and taught in the Kirksville Public School System.

He and his wife, Clara Cassity Schwengel, a 1932 graduate of NMSU, live at 3232 N. Ohio, Arlington, Virginia.

Letters

Dear Mr. Harrison:

First of all, my congratulations on the Nemoscope. I always look forward to receiving it and find the articles interesting and well written.

I would like to especially commend you for the article entitled "Where the Action Was" in the summer 1975 issue. The pictures and text dealing with favorite student hangouts of the past brought back many memories and I was delighted to find myself in one of the pictures. However, I must point out an error. On Page 23, the picture is of the interior of the Snack Shop, not the Bulldog Inn. As I spent many, many hours in this establishment during my years at Northeast Missouri State, I would certainly want my favorite hangout to be properly identified.

Once again, congratulations on an excellent publication. I will look forward to the next issue.

Sincerely,

Rick George
Executive Director

Dear Mr. Harrison,

Thank you very much to send me the alumni magazine and a letter explaining membership in the Association. I've read it many times with happiness.

Enclosed is my membership application and Life membership that I intend to pay it monthly. For the first month $10 as you see now.

Please send me if you have the new issue and if you don't mind, please write about me something in order to tell all my American friends that I very really think of them particularly my roommates at Grim Hall. Tell them I'm ready to write a letter telling everything in my country and also my life there. Then write my name (as my friends here know) "Nellie of Grim Hall." Now I'm working for the Thonburi Teacher College, Bangkok, Thailand.

Sincerely yours,
P. Kaewilai

Mr. R. Russell Harrison,
Executive Secretary,
Alumni Association.

Dear Mr. Harrison,

I enclose a check for two years dues.

The Nemoscope is always interesting, especially the article including a resume of the time when I was in K.S.T.C. I married the young man who took me boating on Owenby's Lake. (How nice all the boys looked, clean, hair neat, and they dressed as though every day were Sunday.)

Intermittently teaching and going to school, I received the A.A. in 1911 and the B.S. in Ed. in 1921. Those wonderful teachers! Their inspiration for me shows in "Highlights of My Teaching Career" included in the "Columbia Area Retired Teachers" part of the State and National R.T.A. project," "Education Since the Turn of the Century."

Very truly yours,

Avis W. St. Clair

Attention: Mr. Thomas R. Shrout, Jr.

Dear Mr. Shrout:

I enjoyed your article, "Where the Action Was," in the summer issue of the Nemoscope very much. A lot of research had gone into it and I know that many old grads read it with great interest.

You did not mention, however, the Dufur family that operated the place just across the street north from the Kirk auditorium in the 30's. The Dufurs served excellent 5 cent hamburgers — six for a quarter and the pinball machine, which paid off in free games, kept such popular teachers as Professor Valentine, band director, occupied and sometimes late to class. The Dufurs' son was an end on the three-year undefeated football team under Don Farout.

Best of luck to you in your future stories about N.E. Mo. S. U.

Sincerely yours,

C. L. Fagan, Chairman

Wreckathon Wins NMSU World Fame

Three world's records were broken during the Northeast Missouri State University United Way Record Wreckathon held during the fall semester. Participants were required to pay an entry fee which was donated to the Adair County United Way campaign. The Guinness Book of World Records was used for guidelines.

A new world's record for continuous frisbee throwing by a six-man team was set. All six members of the team of Greg Gordon of Ballwin, Rich Rhoades of Kirksville, Tom Diehl of Fenton, John Bull of Hannibal and Mike Campbell and Jon Gaschler of Creve Coeur lasted for 38-1/2 hours; five members of the team lasted for 40 hours, 4 minutes. The previous record was 36 hours, 36 minutes.

Gordon was a member of the team that set the previous record in April, 1974, at Lafayette High School in St. Louis.

A coed frisbee team of Candy Smith of Manchester, Iowa, and Stephanie Strode of Hannibal tossed a frisbee for 10 hours. As far as University officials can determine, there is not a record for such an event.

The world record for coin snatching was also broken at the University. Pat McDonald, a sophomore from Tuscumbia, snatched 52 pennies at one time. The standing record was 39.

Three men set new world's records for crawling. Kent Farnsworth of Kirksville and Terry Lunsford of Allerton, Iowa, crawled 12,400 yards; Steve Hemphill of Burlington, Iowa, stopped after 11,800 yards. The previous record was 6.46 miles, approximately 11,370 yards.

Mary Dwyer of Florissant carried a book on her head, without dropping it, for 3-1/2 miles. Her record, along with the others, will be sent to the Guinness Book of World Records for verification.

Larry Pohlpetter of Ft. Madison, Iowa, failed to break the world record of eating 36 glazed or standard donuts in 15 minutes. He had eaten only 20 when his time ran out.

Internships inspire reality in learning

Internships are becoming a popular way for upperclassmen to experience the working environment of a job related to their major and still earn up to a semester of college credit.

The University offers a variety of internships in which students learn through on-the-job experiences. According to Mrs. Mary Redman, secretary to the Dean of Instruction, approximately 113 internships were completed during the past summer. Although many are done during the regular school year, the summer is often a good time for students to gain some practical experience.

The 9 to 5 work day, five days a week, with little or no pay is not uncommon for many interns. Most, however, agree that the experience gained is worth much more than a paycheck.

Byron Coglan, senior sociology major, said that his internship as a medical social worker gave him the opportunity to see if he liked that field. He interned at the Kirksville Osteopathic Hospital Rehabilitation Center where his responsibilities included helping patients and their families adjust to problems brought on by illness.

The benefits of working in the environment, Coglan felt, put his field into a different perspective. "By doing the internship I dealt with all sorts of factors which had a direct bearing on the patient, something you don't learn in a classroom situation."

He has decided that medical social work is not the career for him but plans to continue to study social work in graduate school. He was not paid while completing his internship but feels that it enhanced his possibilities of getting accepted into graduate school.

Carol Draper, senior biology major, interned at the Environmental Trace Substance Research Center (ETSRC) in Columbia, Mo. Her interests are ecological in nature and so was the work which she did for the ETSRC.

Although she intends to go on into graduate studies in biology, Draper said the internship gave her an indication of "what jobs are available in my field" and helped in her course work. She also feels that the internship enhanced her job possibilities "100 per cent." She received a salary, but said the primary benefit of her internship was the future job possibilities.

She is completing a mercury analysis project which she started at the ETSRC. Draper's project dealt with determining the mercury content found in many substances such as fish and foliage.

Denny Brant, senior law enforcement major, completed two internships during the past summer which prompted his decision to get a job in the field of enforcement. He interned at the Missouri State Training School for Men, Moberly, and at the Cedar Rapids Police Department, Cedar Rapids, Iowa. His responsibilities in Cedar Rapids were centered around setting up a microfilm system for the police department, but he often rode patrol with other officers at night on his own time. He received no pay for his internships but gained 15 credit hours. He hopes to obtain a position with the Iowa State Patrol upon graduation.

Susan Crigler, senior political science major, interned as a research aide for Representative Don Hancock at the State Capitol Building in Jefferson City, Mo. She said her experience allowed her to, "grasp a better insight into the governmental system." Her duties mainly involved handling committee work, such as doing research for speeches and writing press releases and public information items. Part of her job entailed a lot of reading which was "government-oriented," she said, and enabled her to learn about the legislative process. After her graduation in December, Crigler took a job as a research aide in Jefferson City.

Day care provides pencils, patience, and social polish

Four-year-old Mindy Boyd arrives at the Kirksville Day Care Center at 8:30 a.m. and heads for one of the child-size tables where several of her little friends are already busy. Teacher Joyce has made shapes on bright-colored construction paper, and the children are cutting them out with their blunt-edged scissors.

Mindy is one of the 30 children between three and six years of age who regularly attend the center.

Her parents, Roger and Sandy Boyd, are University students as are one-third of the parents who send their children to Day Care.

Sandy, an art major who is expecting her second child, believes there is no comparison between Day Care Center and a babysitter's home. "The whole program is a tremendous learning experience for our little girl. She has become much more extroverted and has certainly learned a lot more than I would have taken the time to teach her at home," she said.

Learning happens at the center, but "we don't use formal teaching methods," Rhonda Barfield, one of the three teachers on the staff, said.

During free time which follows tabletime in Mindy's morning, she may go to any of the several interest centers in the large activities room. These include a fish aquarium, dress-up corner, painting center, music center, house-keeping center, farming center and library center. There are also tricycles, large and small blocks and other activities the children can choose.

Following a typical mid-morning snack of graham crackers and juice, Mindy and her friends are visited by High Hat, a group of speech pathology majors who visit the children for an hour on Monday, Wednesday and Friday and play games with words and sounds.

Today they tell the children that acting like someone else would be a foolish thing to do. They give the children "ME" buttons, and together they learn a new song called "I'm Glad I Am Me."

To tie in with this activity, the teachers have planned a unit on self-awareness. On Tuesday and Thursday, the children are divided into groups of ten children per teacher. For this activity the teachers emphasize the concept that you can't understand others until you understand yourself, and the children will be making self-awareness posters.

Teacher Carmi, as the children call Carmi Dougherty, believes the small groups allow the teachers to work with the children as individuals.

A nature walk or free playtime either inside or on the outdoor playground follows lunch. Today the weather is mild, and Mindy and the others are taken outside for a walk to the campus. "We take the children to the campus at least twice a week," Joyce Weatherman, director of the center, said.

Naptime follows the nature walk, and 30 little cots are put up in the activities room and the lights are dimmed.

During this time the teachers work on activities and discuss ideas. As often as possible, the teachers plan special interest trips for the children. In the past, these have included a visit to the fire station, the Kennedy Theatre to see "Bambi," McDonald's for lunch and the Puppet Theatre. The children were also entered in the University Bicentennial Homecoming Parade riding in the back of a pickup truck wearing matching hats and flying little flags.

Joyce Weatherman, who holds a bachelor of arts degree in child development and early childhood, has been the director of the center since February, 1975. "One of our goals," she said, "is to provide a happy, social group experience for the children along with integrated educational activities."

Dougherty, a graduate in speech communication who has worked at the center since June, 1975, believes awareness of words is very important. Emphasis is placed on the verbal rather than the physical at the center as the children learn to verbalize their wants and needs.

Barfield, who just joined the staff in September and holds a BSE in music and speech, left a better paying job to work at the Center. "I wanted to do something worthwhile," she said, "and I feel like this is a worthwhile organization."

The center, located in the basement of the United Methodist Church, is a non-profit organization which rents its facilities from the Church. It is licensed by the state and until this year depended on tuition, which is figured on a sliding income scale, as its only source of revenue. This year, however, the United Way is listing it as one of the 11 agencies it supports.

Baldwin Hall renovation to begin this summer

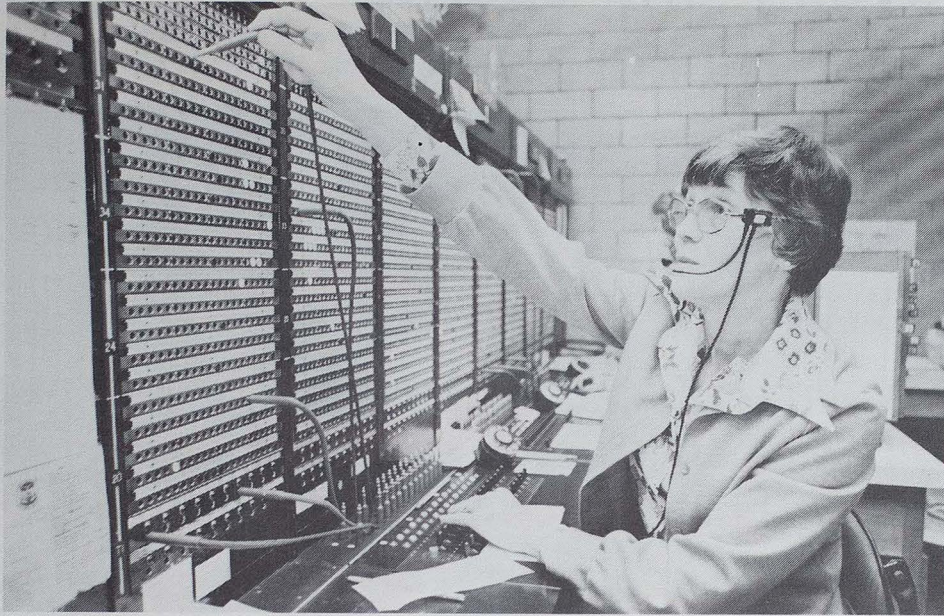

Baldwin Hall renovation to begin this summer.

A two-phase renovation of Baldwin Hall began this summer with major changes in Baldwin Hall Auditorium. The renovation of the auditorium, which began in May, includes acoustical clouds over the orchestra pit, a removal cover of the orchestra pit which will extend the stage, and major lighting and sound system changes.

The renovation of the auditorium is scheduled to be on an accelerated basis and hopefully it will be completed by fall.

By the time the project is completed the building will be converted to an entire academic facility.

NMSU'S 'Ernestine': One Ringie Dingie - Two Ringie Dingie

Someone who is often heard but never seen is the switchboard operator. "With over 1700 phones on campus, and another 25 outside lines, things can get very busy at times," Maxine Goodwin, switchboard supervisor, said.

Some people get very upset if their calls aren't answered by the first ring, Goodwin said, and when we answer a call after the third or fourth ring, we are often asked if we "enjoyed our nap."

But complaints are "just part of the job" and Goodwin sees no point in becoming upset. After 18 years as a campus operator she said she's "heard everything."

Goodwin is assisted by 12 student operators and one night supervisor. Besides helping students with phone calls these operators handle all incoming calls.

"Sometimes the entire switchboard is lit up," Patty Millin, student operator, said.

"If you ever call from off-campus and get a busy signal you know we are super busy."

The phone system on campus is a Private Branch Exchange (PBX) and is one reason students don't have 24-hour phone service.

"It would take a lot more money, equipment and personnel to run a 24-hour phone service," Goodwin said.

When asked if there have been any wiretaps on students' phones, Dale West, Southwestern Bell Telephone repairman, said, "Certainly not within my knowledge. If there ever were any such procedures it would have been to check the working order of the phone."

One common problem, West said, is that students take the receiver off the hook to avoid late night callers.

Some students think operators eavesdrop on their calls. "There is just no way; the girls are constantly at work," Goodwin said. Neither do the girls talk to callers because it is against regulations, and there just isn't any time, she said.

Grads fare well in job market

In today's economy, having a degree is no guarantee that a college graduate will find a job, let alone one that matches his interests. Graduates in most fields in 1975 face the same dilemma: for the approximately 58,430 graduates receiving a bachelor's degree in psychology this year, the Department of Labor estimates there will be only 4,300 new jobs open for psychologists.

Of the more than 1,300 spring and summer graduates at Northeast this year, more than 900 of them requested the services of the University's Bureau of Placements. Ninety per cent of them were placed in jobs.

Were Northeast's graduates just lucky?

Mrs. Kathleen Bohon, assistant director of Placements, said that a student's first choice for a job is naturally in his major. But, often, it's his second field that gets him a job. She added this is especially true of teaching.

NMSU is well known for its teaching reputation and placement of "our top candidates in the field of teaching is almost immediate," she said. Students are advised to "arm themselves with another field to enhance employability." Positions are more readily available for students who are able to extend their services into another area, whether it be in teaching or another field, she said.

Among the employed 1975 graduates is Ernest Clark, a research analyst for the Missouri House of Representatives. Clark feels that his degree is worth quite a bit.

"A lot of schooling has come to play in my job. The same reports I made for economics class are basically what I do now," he said.

Clark, originally a political science major, switched his major because he felt that a business administration degree would be more in demand. He says his political science background has come in handy in his present job.

Leroy Searcy, sixth grade teacher at Rockwood School District, Eureka, Mo., obtained his position through the Bureau of Placements.

"I just filled out my placement papers, interviewed at school, and got my job, all through Northeast, and I like things very well where I am at," he said.

Marcus Phillips with McGladrey, Hanson, Dunn and Company of Iowa City, Iowa, and Connie Heape with Price Warehouse Company of St. Louis, Mo., both obtained accounting positions through the Bureau of Placements.

Carolyn Fernadez, who graduated with a BSE in Art, is employed by the St. Louis City School District and is currently teaching various subjects at Beaumont High School.

However, there are those graduates who have not been able to find jobs in their field. Resourcefulness and a willingness to accept a temporary compromise is all that many feel can be done at the present time.

Jim Jae, a law enforcement graduate, is currently employed by Martin Construction Company, Hannibal, Mo., but is hopeful that a more permanent interest-related position will soon come along. Jae admits that, under the present circumstances, he sometimes questions what his diploma is worth. He had hoped that after four years of college he would be able to get, "a better job with better conditions, advancement possibilities and pay." He still keeps in contact with the Bureau of Placements hoping for leads and interviews on his own time.

Robert Calhoun, biology major and Daryl Schaffer, political science major, are also employed in the field of construction. However, neither intend to make a career of it.

Calhoun said, "Jobs are just hard to find and at least with working construction, it keeps me in shape and beats sitting home all day and doing nothing." He plans to continue his schooling in hopes of getting a job "oriented toward the field of biology or science."

Schaffer, employed by Massman Construction Company, said he feels that a second area of study would have probably made the difference in his working situation right now. "I feel that a political science degree is not very practical unless a person is going into law or a governmental position," he said.

Schaffer eventually plans on going to law school. Currently, he is the only person in the St. Louis crew who has a degree and admits that others ride him about wasting four years. However, he said, "I hardly consider it a waste and I intend to use my degree to get any job I can."

Rivalry Still Sparks Over Hickory Stick

Coach Taylor presents stick to President McClain.

When the Bulldogs met the Bearcats of Northwest Missouri State University at Maryville they played not only to maintain their conference lead shared with Southeast, but they fought to bring the famous hickory stick back home with them.

In this Bicentennial year it seems appropriate to feature a bit of University tradition. Many students may have never heard of the rivalry over the coveted hickory stick which exists between the two sister institutions.

According to Dr. Walter H. Ryle, president emeritus, "Some of the hardest fought games the Bulldogs have played on the gridiron have been in an effort to retain or return the stick to the campus."

In 1930 at the close of the football season, Uel W. Lampkin, president of Northwest, conceived the idea that it would be nice to have some trophy between Northwest and Northeast that would create a little enthusiasm and sentiment.

He had the stick made from a tree which was on a farm where Eugene Fair, the president of Northeast, had been born and raised in Harrison County. He sent the stick to President Fair since the Bulldogs had defeated the Bearcats 20-7 that year with the comment: "You can hold it until next year."

It was in this spirit of friendly rivalry between the two long-time friends that the hickory stick became a coveted trophy. "It has been a great instrument of which coaches have created a lot of spirit and enthusiasm on the part of the team to be sure to win," Dr. Ryle said.

On Armistice Day in 1931, the two teams battled for the stick for the first time with the Bulldogs losing their first conference game in five years to the Bearcats by a score of 7-0 in the last two minutes of the game.

The 1932 ECHO recorded the event in these words: "A sea of mud retarded the strength of both teams as a driving downpour of rain began the previous day and continued throughout the game. The Bulldogs played in Bearcat territory the first three quarters and outplayed them in every phase of the game, only to weaken in the last two minutes and to be beaten by a score of seven to nothing."

The scores of the games played between the two teams since 1908 have been recorded on the stick as well as every year's score played since with the exception of the four war years, 1942-45, when no games were played.

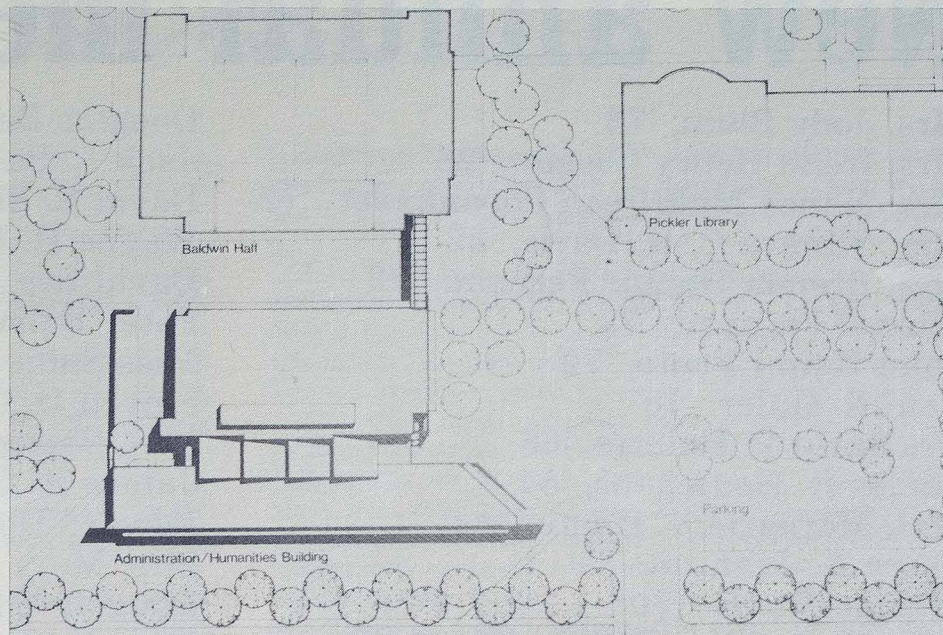

In the event of a tie, the stick remains in the hands of the school that holds it, Dr. Ryle said. There have been four ties since 1931.

Although this is his first year at NMSU, Coach Ron Taylor is aware of the tradition and strongly believes in it. "I would like to see it get to be a very big thing again."

A self-confessed lover of tradition, he thinks that the college students of the '70's are starting to see that there is value in the past and that parts of it are worth perpetuating.

Maryville has won the hickory stick 14 times since 1931, while the Bulldogs have won 23 of the games played for the stick. This year, the Bulldogs' tough defense held the Bearcats scoreless and went on to win the contest 20-0, bringing the stick back to Northeast for the first time since 1971.

A / H building construction continues

Twenty new classrooms are expected to be ready for students at Northeast Missouri State University sometime early in 1977 with the opening of the University's new Administration/Humanities Building. In addition to the classrooms, the building will have 40 faculty offices and house the divisions of Social Science and Language and Literature.

The administrative section of the building will contain the offices of the President, Dean of Administration, Dean of Instruction, Dean of Students, Graduate Dean, Public Relations, Financial Aids, Housing, Freshman Counseling, Admissions/Registrar, Business Office, Stenographic and Data Processing.

Back to the Books

by Maggie Jarrett

Last September the University's registrar received a letter from "freshman" Joseph W. Thompson of Kirksville. It read in part:

Dear Sir: I received the questionnaire addressed to me as a freshman. I suppose this is technically correct, this being my first registration as a student at Northeast Missouri State University.

However, I am 78 years of age, born January 8, 1897. I hold the degrees of A.B. (Missouri Wesleyan College, now Baker University; S.T.B. and S.T.M. (Boston University School of Theology); and D.D. (Honorary, Central Wesleyan College.)

The letter closed with, "P.S. Does this make me the oldest registered student now attending the University?"

Nationwide, policemen, housewives, teachers, active and retired businessmen and career women are returning to college for numerous reasons. Some are going back as a way to reenter the work force, others for job promotions, still others as a means of personal development or a way to learn new viewpoints. Many say they're enrolled in college classes not so much to "get with it" as "to stay with it."

A sampling of "over 30" students interviewed recently at Northeast showed that many of them share similar attitudes about continuing their education.

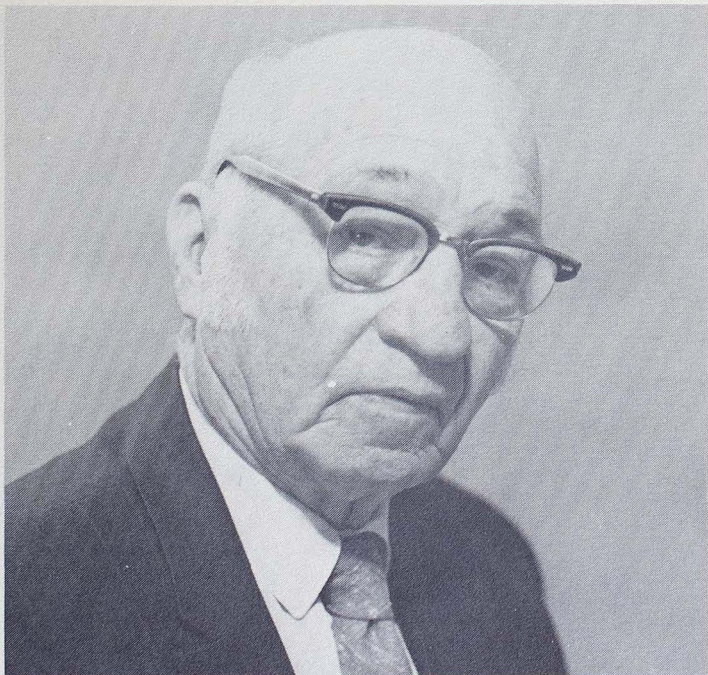

The Rev. Joseph Thompson is enrolled in a "World Civilizations" course this semester taught by his friend, Dr. Meredith Eller. He enrolled in the course (which he is auditing) to "see what the collegiate world is saying about some of our present day problems — how we got in the mess we're in and how we're going to get out of it."

Rev. Thompson is pastor emeritus of the United Methodist Church in Kirksville and in the 1930's taught the first credit course in religion offered at the University. He now assists at the church in Kirksville and is a frequent guest preacher in area churches.

One of his main interests, aside from the church, is studying the present sociological, economic and cultural state of the world and comparing it with past civilizations. As a long-time student of history he says he has only found one or two instances in which cultures have temporarily reversed themselves once they started on a road of moral decline, a situation he sees somewhat paralleled in today's society. He plans to take other courses at the University that will wrestle with the questions "Are we on a downslide now? How did we get here? Is there any hope for developing a genuine world truce?"

At approximately one-half Rev. Thompson's age is 40-year-old Terry Troester, part-owner of Troesters Clothing store in Kirksville. After graduating from Northeast in 1958 with a degree in business administration, Troester took several business-oriented courses in the early 60's and then didn't take any formal courses again until about two years ago. That's when he became intrigued with mechanics.

The Reverend Joseph Thompson

Terry Troester

He took an auto-body mechanics course at the area vocational-technical school and last summer was enrolled (for credit) in a welding class at the University. The course met from 7:30-9:30 a.m., three days a week. Dressed in "grubbies," he would pack his suit in a bag and ride to class on his bicycle. After class he pedaled uptown to his store, changed clothes, and was ready for business. He spent many lunch hours, dressed in overalls, in the lab working on class projects.

"This interest in doing things with my hands is kind of a crazy thing. I never did things like this in high school. I guess you could say I'm reverting back to being a kid," Troester said.

The father of four children, ages 13 to 20, he calls himself a "great do-it-yourselfer." He recently rebuilt a 1963 International Scout, built an addition onto his home and is now tearing down and repainting the family's 1970 stationwagon. He's enrolled in another auto mechanics course at the voc-tech school and plans to enroll in a wood-working course at the University whenever the class schedule and his business schedule coincide. His wife, the former Dyana Lynn Hartley, is working on a masters degree in psychiatric nursing at the University of Missouri-Columbia this year and working part-time at the Kirksville Regional Center. She graduated from Northeast in 1971 with a master's degree.

Mrs. Mary Bennett, 45, has always had a "feeling for beautiful things." So five years ago when her older son was in Vietnam, her younger son in grade school and her husband busy with his job, she decided to begin her college career. She expects to complete a bachelor's degree in art in December, 1976.

"I didn't come to school for the degree but for the knowledge and enjoyment of my art. I've always had a feeling for beautiful things, an honesty about beauty and nature. My teachers have been wonderful in encouraging me to express myself," she said.

Her senior art show at the University in November was entitled "Reflections of My World" and included drawings and paintings of scenes from her family's farm in rural Adair County.

She says it's been tough sometimes to combine her responsibilities to her family and her classwork but her family has been very cooperative in giving her opportunities to study. When she completes her degree she may find a job as a substitute art teacher.

Now a quarter-time instructor on the University's business faculty, 53-year-old Pete Koumas started back to college in the Spring, 1974 semester — 23 years after completing an accounting degree at the University of Illinois. He started with the idea of being able to build on his experiences earned during 17 years employment with Hollister, Inc., a surgical instrument plant in Kirksville. He retired as vice-president and plant manager there in 1973.

Mary Bennett

Pete Koumas

For him, earning a master's degree was a long-sought-after goal, one he had thought about since he earned his bachelor's degree.

"Some people want a master's degree for the status or for job advancement. I wanted it as an achievement. I was the only one of five children to get a college degree. Besides, my son is working on a master's degree now and I wanted to stay even with him," Koumas said.

Koumas said even though he had taken a certified public accountants' refresher course and several income tax courses in night school, he felt he had "fallen back."

"It was tough to come back to school. I had built up an image of myself as a 'dummy' in comparison to the other students and I had to work hard to overcome it," he said.

Koumas graduated after 39 hours of course work with a 3.83 grade point average in August, 1975.

He enjoys teaching an undergraduate course in "Principles of Management" now and says that his students have told him they appreciate learning from someone "who's been there."

Koumas plans to continue teaching on a part-time basis while maintaining his involvement in the Kirksville community. He is currently chairman of the Kirksville Planning and Zoning Commission, president of the board of the Adair County United Way, chairman of the board of the Green Rivers Chapter of the March of Dimes and a YMCA board member.

Dianthe Cable

Mrs. Dianthe J. Cable, 37, is the wife of the University's Sports Information Director and mother of two daughters, ages 5 and 9. She graduated from Northeast in 1960 with a degree in music and taught music in elementary schools for several years. In the Spring, 1973 semester she took "Educational and Occupational Information" as sort of a teaser. She liked it immediately and decided to pursue a masters degree in counseling and guidance.

"I started back to school so I would have another option, besides music, if I decided to go back to work full-time after my daughters are older. I hope to continue taking classes on a part-time basis and complete the program by Spring, 1977. Then, if I do decide to work, I will be qualified for counseling jobs in such areas as hospitals and diagnostic clinics as well as industry.

Busy with family responsibilities, Dianthe studies when Sara is in nursery school and at night after both children are in bed. In her time away from the books she is a girl scout leader, organist at the United Methodist Church and for a local funeral home, president of the C.Z. chapter of P.E.O. and a member of the University Dames.

Austin "Mac" McBee takes a full load of classes most semesters while holding down what he considers a 24 hour-a-day, 365-day-a-year job. As head of the local chapter of the American Red Cross, Mac, age 54, is "on call" around the clock to supply volunteer blood donors in emergencies, to assist veterans, to direct overseas communications, to direct various training programs and to "be there" when a drug addict or alcoholic needs someone to talk with.

He started taking University classes in the Spring of 1974 because he felt he could be more effective at his job if he had some formal training in how to work with people as individuals, a principle he believes is essential. He expects to complete a degree in sociology next fall.

"The hardest thing about taking courses is having to 'unlearn' some of the habits I've formed over the years. I've learned some things the hard way and have done them in one way or another for so many years it's tough to change. My courses are showing me different, better, ways to handle certain situations," he said.

Mac became Red Cross director six years ago following his retirement from 30 years of military service. He plans to continue in the same job after graduation.

Mrs. Mary L. Detweiler found that once she started back to college, taking courses has become "kind of contagious." She enrolled in the University in the fall of 1974 — 23 years after earning a teaching degree.

When she started work as a volunteer in her husband's church library, she found herself unfamiliar with the Dewey cataloging system. Her husband is the Rev. Richard Detweiler, pastor of the United Methodist Church in Kirksville, which operates a 800-volume library with an emphasis on religious literature and a large reference section. Mrs. Detweiler is taking courses part-time now and working toward the minimum 18 hours required for certification as a librarian.

She is taking courses both as an adjunct to her church work and as "security in case anything happened to my husband." She is 46 and has two sons living at home and one in the Navy.

Mrs. Joyce Rollins, B.S.E. '42, feels it's more important to keep up with what's new in education than to work towards a masters degree. She's been taking a variety of courses since 1961 on a part-time basis while teaching in the elementary grades. She feels that taking more than one course at a time would take away too much of her spare time with her teenage daughter.

This semester she's taking a course in environmental sciences and finds she's able to apply many of the principles she's learning in teaching her first grade class at Greenwood Elementary School. In the future she plans to take courses in reading and the metric system.

She is a member of the board for the local Sheltered Workshop and a member of the Region II Planning and Coordinating Council for Development Disabilities.

Earning degrees with experience's help seems to be based not only on a desire for career improvement but for personal enrichment as well.

Mapping New Terrain

by Thomas R. Shrout Jr.

Last fall Joan Clarke enrolled in Speech Communications 170 taught by Drs. Richard and Linda Heun. After the first day, Joan chose not to attend any of the class meetings. For one three-week period she disregarded speech completely as she concentrated on midterm exams in her major field. Two weeks before the end of the semester she had earned an A in Speech Communications.

Have standards slipped at NMSU? Hardly, in fact, they are just as tough, if not tougher, than what they were a few years ago. But what has changed is the methods Joan Clarke (fictitious name) and other students use in Speech Communications 170 as well as other courses across the campus.

What makes it unique is that students rarely meet in a formal classroom setting more than twice during the semester. In fact, the traditional 15-week semester concept is ignored as students have up to a year to complete the course, taking tests when they feel they have mastered the material. In place of the traditional learning environment, the student devotes his time to individualized study, small discussion groups and one-on-one feedback sessions with the instructor.

What makes this new approach to learning work is an innovative faculty and an instrument known as the learning style map.

Drs. Richard and Linda Heun adopted the new approach to Speech 170, going so far as to write a textbook specifically designed for the course. The textbook and course is based on the fact that different people learn best in different ways and therefore can achieve the same course objectives in a variety of ways.

According to the Heuns: "The consideration of prime importance in enabling people to develop and use key communication skills. If it takes one person somewhat longer to develop listening skills we believe in working with him to help develop that essential competency."

Essentially the approach is designed to make attainment of high levels of knowledge and skill the constant and the student time and methods of learning the variable. This is the concept of master learning where virtually every student learns at least 90 per cent of the material.

For each of the course objectives in Speech Communications 170, there are at least 10 ways, or modes, in which the student can learn the objectives. These modes range from viewing video tape lectures, learning experiences, reading the textbook, to completing an individualized project or listening to an instructional tape recording.

Coupled with the change in the way Speech Communications 170 is presented, has been a change in the objectives of the course.

"No longer do our students in Speech Communications 170 only give a certain number of speeches during the semester. Rather, they are expected to know a great deal about all the basic skills of communication when the complete the course," said Dr. Richard Heun.

For example, some of the aspects of communication which the Heuns take up in their textbook, Developing Skills for Human Interaction, include an emphasis on listening and nonverbal communication. The textbook offers the student several ways to understand these concepts.

For instance, a student who has difficulty gaining meaning from reading or hearing someone describe the importance of personal space in nonverbal communication may be asked to go into the library and look for a table at which only one person is studying.

the center of education with the method of teaching fitting their needs

The textbook tells the student to: "Take the seat immediately beside the person. Begin working but be very conscious of the person's reactions to you. Try this several different times and note the varying reactions to this imposition on someone's personal space. How do individuals cope with the situation?"

The student would then report his findings back to the Heuns for their evaluation and input. When the student feels he has mastered a concept he can ask to be tested over it. The student is expected to achieve 100 percent on the test or continue to work until he has mastered the material.

When the student achieves the three basic core skills of Speech Communications 170 at 100 percent, he has earned a grade of C. At this point the student can take this grade and leave the course or go on to further options for higher grades.

"Often the student will propose his own course of study beyond the core program. The students contract for their grades and are expected to complete the material during the one-year time limit. Almost all students finish the material within a semester and some come to the course knowledgeable of the basic communications skills and can cover the material with superior grades within a few weeks."

The Heuns have kept careful records of their students and find that since going to this new approach for basic speech, 92 percent of the students leave the course attaining 100 percent of the skills and objectives.

This dramatic success, however, would not have been possible if it had not been for the learning style map brought to the campus by Dr. Robert V. Schnucker, professor of history and religion.

He became interested in different modes of instruction during the summer of 1972 when teaching Western Civilization.

"I had been dissatisfied with the way I was teaching because I found many students disliked the course. The next summer I decided to assume that the library was the natural center for learning on the campus for a history course. I abandoned formal lectures to a great extent and supplemented the course with film loops, tapes and sound/slide presentations," Dr. Schnucker said.

The students seemed to like the changes so Dr. Schnucker began studying this form of instruction, receiving an internal grant from the University to develop methods of individualized instruction. He identified Oakland Community College in the Detroit, Michigan, area as an institution which had converted its entire campus to the "Personalized System of Instruction."

Oakland had adopted the plan in an effort to reach more of the inner city students whose learning skills were not up to what was considered college level.

The traditional method of instruction had been abandoned there since tests revealed only about one-third of the students were making a maximum positive response to that mode of instruction.

However, when Dr. Schnucker visited the campus to view their plan, he found that Oakland had abandoned it. Although some students were making excellent progress through this plan, still only about one-third of the students were being reached.

In its place Oakland and its new president, Joseph E. Hill, had introduced a testing procedure that determines the learning skills of every individual student and then can be used to tailor fit as many learning modes as possible to the learning skills of each individual student.

When this happens Dr. Schnucker noted, "Students become the center of education with the method of teaching fitting their needs rather than the structured course with the students having to fit their learning style to the instructors mode of teaching."

A paper by Dr. Leon Karel, NMSU professor of aesthetic education and humanities, describes how the cognitive map works:

"The cognitive map begins with a test which the learner fills out. In the version used at NMSU there are 216 items, each of which is answered with a check under one of three columns; Rarely, Sometimes, or Usually. The items are unusual, dealing with many kinds of experiences that a student might have in his everyday life, for example: 'I can distinguish fresh fruit from stale fruit by the smell; I make my own political choices; I try not to say things which hurt the feelings of others; I find it necessary to write down a telephone number as soon as I hear it.'

"After the learner has filled out the test, it is scored and run through the computer. What comes out is a rather complex looking set of scores ordered into three groupings. These, when taken as a whole, constitute the learning style and aptitude of the student.

"First there is a section called "Symbol Uses" which indicates the learner's ability to use the various sensory channels, singly and in combination, for learning purposes. Next comes a section on "Interpersonal Relationships" which indicates how the learner works and learns in conjunction with others. A final section deals in patterns of thought employed by the learner. All of these put together add up to the learner's total learning style."¹

are made in a society which tends to have a visual rather than an aural memory

Dr. Schnucker returned to Kirksville a disciple of President Hill's approach and an advocate of cognitive mapping among the faculty. During the fall of 1973 he administered the first maps to his World Civilization students, finding out how they best learned, then adapted individualized teaching techniques he had experimented with the previous summer to the newly identified individual student needs.

Dr. Schnucker also published a modular learning program to facilitate the self-learning process. The program included a series of nine booklets entitled The World of Europe. Each booklet is accompanied by a study manual which offers the students a variety of short tests, thought questions and study suggestions to help him learn the material.

The experiment was successful. Pre-testing and post-testing of students who were involved with Dr. Schnucker's classes compared to other sections of World Civilization showed greater achievement on the part of students who had been mapped and had learned through the modes to which they were best suited. The students in Dr. Schnucker's class learned 1/3 more than those in the traditionally taught class. Further, the students became more positive to the subject of history.

One of the things which Dr. Schnucker learned almost immediately was that the students who learned best in a particular course were those students whose maps most nearly matched the cognitive map of the instructor. (Dr. Schnucker and others using the technique post their maps for students to review.)

This was dramatically demonstrated recently when an instructor mapped his students when only about 50 percent were passing the course. He found the only ones who were passing were those whose cognitive maps matched his.

Dr. Schnucker also found that the traditional form of teaching should have a diminished role in the learning environment. He noted that lecturing developed during the middle ages when the students had no textbooks, and although textbooks are common today, yet lecturing has hung on.

"Most instructors use the lecture mode of instruction which is probably the least efficient method of teaching. NMSU students read somewhere between 175 and 300 words per minute and most instructors can lecture no faster than 150 words per minute. There is an obvious lack of efficiency here."

Dr. Schnucker also noted that textbooks could do the same job as many lectures, "the textbooks are better organized and they don't digress as instructors do during a lecture."

Finally he added that most instructors assume that all students have superior learning skills and retain all the materials which are covered in a class period.

"All of these assumptions are made in a society which tends to have a visual rather than an aural memory," he concluded.

Students taking World Civilization from Dr. Schnucker might still have a lecture, but now it has been taped in advance which allows the student the advantage to hear it at his convenience and to review sections of the tape which he may have not understood the first time through.

Using this method of instruction the instructor now takes on a much different role. As Dr. Richard Heun noted, "the instructor becomes a learning facilitator rather than an information giver."

Dr. Schnucker's interest in cognitive mapping spread through the campus, first to the Heuns, then to other faculty members, each using the maps in varying ways. As an example, Dr. Leon Karel, professor of aesthetic education and humanities, uses the maps in his Music Appreciation class. He says the maps are helpful to both him and the student in determining how the student should complete his outside assignments. The assignments are basically unstructured, requiring only that the student attend at least seven musical events during the semester and report on them.

The question that the students most often ask Dr. Karel is "how much do I have to do for a certain grade?"

"When answering the student I make an analogy to a student who goes out for the track team. The student doesn't ask the coach, 'How fast do I have to run?' Neither should a student ask me, 'How much do I have to learn?' I challenge the student, trying to get him to substitute the joy of learning as the student's motivation rather than grades," Dr. Karel said.

Others using cognitive mapping include some members of the Health and Physical Education, Nursing, Science, Fine Arts and Education Divisions.

But even with this broad range of acceptance, there are those in the education community who question some of the practices in the use of cognitive mapping.

Critics point out that by concentrating on a student's strengths in the learning process, nothing is being done to help him overcome his weaknesses. However, provisions are made to eliminate this weakness at NMSU. Students whose maps reveal deficiencies in reading or study habits are referred to the Study Skills Clinic, directed by Dr. Viola Martin.

It is surprising how often a student can turn himself around in a couple of semesters

Here, Dr. Martin further tests the students to get an accurate assessment of their weaknesses.

"After I identify their weakness and the seriousness of it, I develop a program for them to improve their reading or study skills," Dr. Martin said. The program may range from three weeks to an entire semester or in some cases the whole year to augment the student's weakness.

Presently there is no formal program to help students who show deficiencies in their listening abilities although the Heuns do work with some students individually.

Cognitive mapping also is used in the Counseling and Testing Division. Students who apply for readmittance to NMSU after academic suspension must work through this office. Here they are administered a battery of tests including the learning style map. The map is interpreted to the student so he will know how he best learns.

"Often as part of the contract for these students to be readmitted, they will have to agree to work with Dr. Martin in the Study Skills Clinic to improve their learning skills," said Dr. Robert M. Wright, director of counseling and testing.

"It is surprising how often a student can turn himself around in a couple of semesters after he knows how he best learns and with the help of Dr. Martin and the Study Skills Clinic," Dr. Wright said.

In addition to helping students who have been on academic probation, colleges and universities in other parts of the country are making use of the techniques in other areas. One college is using the map in an effort to find more compatible room mates for dormitories. Others are using it to match students with instructors and some are using maps for faculty development purposes.

Application of the map also is being made in business and industry by personnel officers and employee counselors.

What lies ahead? Currently the Heuns and Dr. Schnucker are developing another section of the learning style map test which analyzes the students' memory capabilities. Questions asked will include "I can find my personal possessions with ease; I can recall in detail the places I've been; and I can ignore noise in a learning environment."

These questions and others attempt to describe the processes which are necessary for the storage and retrieval of information whether it be recall, recognition, association or retention. It also analyzes a person's relative concern with remembering persons, processes, or properties. Finally, it describes the way a person functions within his memory system, his ability to acquire new information, use that information which he has acquired, ignore irrelevant, distracting events and to concentrate on the appropriate event.

The new section of the learning style mapping is now in the testing process at NMSU, but already it has brought such notoriety to the University that Drs. Heun, Schnucker, Karel and others have presented papers to state, regional and national conferences about their successes.

In addition, they are working with other colleges as well as secondary schools to help them implement learning style mapping in their settings.

But the new technique may have implications beyond the classroom, even to the state capitol and taxpayer. As an example, if a student can learn one-third more material using learning style maps and individualized instruction, theoretically he could learn the same amount of material in three years as another student using traditional methods could learn in four.

Should this method of instruction be used to reduce the academic calendar and reduce the expense of running multi-million dollar colleges and universities, or should it be used to enrich the quality of instruction at these schools?

The question is a difficult one and while the answer is being sought, work will go on at Northeast to find even better methods of teaching and helping students make a worthwhile contribution to society.
